Not illustrated.1860 Excerpt: ... DIARY IN THE LEBANON. CHAPTER I. MARONITE CONVENTS. The day having suddenly brightened, I had time to reach Emir Hydars residence, and rejoiced to quit the den where I had been confined in darkness and smoke, though not sorry to have gone through it. I had begun to appreciate vividly the inconvenience of winter travelling in the Lebanon; but so soon as I had emerged into the open air, and looked around on the prospect, the sun glistening on the snowy crests, and on the green tops of the pines, and penetrating to the red earth from which they grew, or rather seemed to stretch themselves, I again forgot the toil and inconveniences, and applauded my resolution; for such fresh sweet air, such bright colours, no other season could produce. We found the population scattered through the thin pine forests, gathering wood and digging out roots. I eyed them now with a haberdashers eye, and scrutinized each Meintan and Jeleck, knowing the value of each piece of stuff. I found that I had, as regards the women at least, underrated their costume; the groups were charming amid the mixture of green and red, furnished by the shade above and the soil beneath. We ascended a flat ridge about the width of the esplanade leading to Edinburgh Castle, with the precipitous sides falling away to a depth of one or two thousand feet; the crests, sweeping round, formed amphitheatres which everywhere exhibited entire geological sections. Here and there were stairs of terraces, patches and levels of the picturesque pines, and in all directions, willows; on the cliffs, in the vales, or among the precipices. The volcanic matter I had hitherto observed only cropping out under the limestone, here it lay on the top of the limestone; the dividing line stretched, as the horizon itself, level an...
